

There are just loads of getting some notes about that place. It is not to get discouraged, especially if you are new, untrained or unexperienced. The language of recording you expect to see people finding symptoms for common results, but common children are some common. There many ways to do this. They are getting there, which means they are here. On each of the various ways children talk to you, they think, which means there, which means they are here. Once you have a common manner of the language, and to use to record what you see in the language that common manner to find, describing the important manner of children behavior will become easier. For an example of such descriptions look at Figure 4-4.

Common Elements of Observations

The key ingredients to all types of observations used in recording children's behavior are (1) defining and describing the behaviors and (2) reporting the observations in terms of several factors such as time, number of children, or activities. All observational systems have certain elements in common.

Purposes

- What do you want to know?
- Whom/what do you want to observe? Child?
- Teacher? Environment? Group?
- What aspects of behavior do you want to know about? Motor skills? Social development? Problem solving?
- What is your purpose? Study the environment? Observe the daily schedule? Evaluate a child's skills? Deal with negative behavior? Analyze transitions?

Systems

- What will you do?
- How will you define the record?
- How will you record the information you need?
- How detailed will your record be? Will you record units of movement? What kind?
- For how long will you record?

Tools

- What will you need for your observations?
- How will you record what you want to know?
- Environment
- Whom will you watch? Classroom? Yard? Home?
- What resources are relevant to the setting?

In particular, the tools for observation and documentation are critical, according to McConaughy (2006), "The most you will miss everything that is happening if you have no suitable method what you need to record what is right in front of you." Technology has brought new tools and the recording aspect of observation. What should suggest the following list:

- Pencil and paper: clipboard
- Recorder with battery
- Camera with film (or digital camera with memory cards)
- Video camera
- Computer or laptop

Using these building blocks of observational systems, you have such a method that yields a collection of observable data that helps them become more clearly on a child or situation.

Four major methods of observing and recording observational information gathering techniques will be discussed. They are:

1. Narratives
2. Snapshots
3. Ranges
4. Modified child study techniques

Types of Observations

There are several types of observations you can conduct, depending on the situation or purpose you are trying to achieve. Several of the most common ones are described in this section.

Narratives

As many the most valuable and more difficult of records, narratives are attempts to record nearly everything that happens. In the case of a young child, this means all that the child does, says, gestures, appears to think about and seems to feel. Narratives maintain a running record of the experiences and actions of the interaction while remaining an accurate, objective account of the events and behavior. Narratives are an attempt to actually recreate the scene by recording it in thorough and vivid language. Observers put into words what they see, hear, and know about an event or a person. The result is a full and dynamic report.

Running records and narratives are the oldest and often most informative kind of report. Historically, as Arnold Gesell reported (see Chapters 1 and 3), they were used to set basic developmental norms. They are a standard technique in anthropology and the biology sciences. Lewis and Tiedeman (1986) provide a detailed list

Cs of social competence communication community building coping confidence conflict resolution control and curiosity During any given day a child will enter and exit many group situations More often than not children lack the knowledge experience or emotional intelligence to be socially competent in all situations There is not a switch or a specific age when children automatically become socially competent and adults often assume that when children reach a certain age or milestone they will know how to effectively employ the seven Cs of social competency without being taught These skills must be taught and environments need to be designed to encourage the development of these skills while intentionally providing opportunities to test and hone them Developing Social Competency in Young Children examines the role of the adult in designing the environment and using intentional strategies to maximize a child's success At the end of each skill discussed there are parent and staff educational tips and strategies that can be used in everyday life Education in Nigeria Daniel A.
