

1985,²² but there is still controversy about the efficacy of some measures. In extreme cases, when there is very little or no useful hearing in a single affected ear, destruction of the inner ear—labyrinthectomy—has long been recognised as effective^{23,24} and may almost be guaranteed to prevent further vertigo. When hearing must be preserved several so called conservative procedures are available. For most otologists decompression of the endolymphatic sac is the first option. The sac is accessible deeply behind the ear, through the mastoid, where it lies between the posterior fossa dura and the temporal bone, anteromedial to the sigmoid sinus. Whether the sac is simply exposed (and thereby decompressed), or drained into the mastoid air cell system, or its lumen shunted into the subarachnoid cerebrospinal fluid space probably makes little difference to the results: about four fifths of patients may expect considerable or total relief from attacks of vertigo.^{25,26} A tiny percentage may have further damage to hearing. In the early stages of Menière's disease, when the hearing level fluctuates, the hearing may be improved, although there are statistical snags in this justification for early surgical intervention. How this operation works is uncertain (even whether it works has been questioned²⁷). Some tests of cochlear function in association with dehydration or with fluid loading may possibly predict the outcome.²⁸

Hearing may also be preserved, while the unruly labyrinth is disconnected from the brain, by cutting the vestibular nerve—through the middle cranial fossa or through the posterior fossa.^{29,30} The risk to the patient is greater than from simple surgery of the sacculus, but relief from vertigo is more certain.³¹ Other procedures that some otologists use include drainage of the sacculus through the stapes footplate,³² and shunting of the cochlear duct (containing endolymph) into the perilymph space of the scala tympani,³³ but both these operations carry a high risk of hearing loss.

Bilateral disease presents a different challenge as patients may become continuously unsteady from vestibular deficit rather than intermittently vertiginous, and hearing loss often becomes the most disturbing component of the disability.

Bleeding tonsils

Beware the "bleeding quinsy"

Spontaneous tonsillar haemorrhage is an uncommon but serious complication of tonsillitis. Several recent reports have described patients who lost large amounts of blood from peripheral vessels.¹⁻³ Less common, but more catastrophic, is the bleeding that may occur after erosion of the great vessels of the carotid sheath.⁴

In a large group of patients considered to be at risk of spontaneous tonsillar haemorrhage Griffies et al described bleeding in eight out of 754 with tonsillitis.¹ Bleeding stopped spontaneously in three and was controlled by local measures in the rest, although blood loss ranged from 250 ml to 700 ml. Other patients have required emergency tonsillectomy: McCormick and Hassett described a 2 year old child with tonsillitis who lost 550 ml (over half his circulating blood volume),² and Skinner and Chui described two similar cases.³ John et al also removed a tonsil for persistent bleeding; their patient subsequently developed measles.⁴ Infectious mononucleosis is another cause of tonsillar haemorrhage.^{5,6}

All these cases arose from peripheral tonsillar vessels. Stevens has recently reminded us of the fact that spontaneous tonsillar haemorrhage may also arise from the great vessels of the carotid sheath.⁷ The internal carotid artery is most often affected, though the external carotid artery and internal jugular vein are also at risk. The characteristic presentation is a sudden severe haemorrhage from the nose or mouth (or even the ear).⁷ If the patient survives the initial bleed recurrent massive haemorrhage occurs and may be associated with formation of a false aneurysm. The possibility of a true aneurysm of the carotid artery presenting as a quinsy must also be borne in mind.⁸

Any patient with spontaneous tonsillar haemorrhage whose bleeding is severe enough to warrant surgical intervention or who has a suspected peritonsillar or parapharyngeal abscess or neurological signs (Horner's syndrome or paralysis of cranial nerves IX, X, XI, or XII) should undergo carotid arteriography.⁹ If the bleeding is from a peripheral tonsillar vessel tonsillectomy is the treatment of choice. If the internal carotid artery is implicated it needs to be ligated. If, however, cross circulation through the circle of Willis cannot be shown on angiography gradual clamping of the carotid artery or carotid ligation plus extracranial-intracranial bypass may be safer. Back bleeding from the circle of Willis is a potential problem that could be overcome by the transluminal insertion of steel coils,¹⁰ although implanting coils into a potentially infected vessel may carry its own risks.
