ABSTRACT In this article I propose a model that posits three major sources of influence on behavior—basic human nature (via universal psychological processes), culture (via social roles), and personality (via individual role identities) and argue that individual behaviors are the products of the interaction between the three. I discuss how culture emerges from the interaction of basic human nature and the ecological contexts in which groups exist, and how social roles are determined by culture-specific psychological meanings attributed to situational contexts. The model further suggests that situational context moderates the relative contributions of the three sources in influencing behavior. I provide examples of apparent contradictory findings in the study of emotion that can be explained by the model proposed.

Despite the widespread acceptance of the idea that context exerts powerful influences on behavior, psychology has yet to develop adequate models to explain how this influence occurs and especially why behavior is influenced in some contexts but not others. In the cross-cultural literature on emotion, for instance, some studies demonstrate pancultural universality in some aspects of emotion; others demonstrate strong and reliable cultural and personality differences.

Recent work elucidating the nature and function of situational specificity in personality processes (Roberts, 2006; Wood &
