

Distributed Narrative: Telling Stories Across Networks

Introduction

Until recently, narratives have been constructed to achieve unity. While postmodern narratives open out into fragments and bricolage in content, plot and style, distributed narratives take this further, opening up the formal and physical aspects of the work and spreading themselves across time, space and the network. You see your first fragments of Implementation on stickers posted on signposts on your way to work and find the rest online when you google a remembered sentence. Surrender Control sends you text messages regardless of where you are or what you're doing. You read Online Caroline and Blue Company in a series of emails arriving in your inbox amid spam and work mail. A character in a fictional weblog sends you instant messages and appears in the comments of a political weblog you also happen to read. This paper is a first mapping of this new field of narrative.

Mapping distributed narratives is not an easy task; it is hard to describe and locate things that are not things but connections. It is difficult to think about distributed narrative. Our languages have developed to name discrete objects. It is far easier to talk about a river or a human than to discuss the system of molecules or cells that make up each of these "things". As Steve Himmer writes of weblogs, "This absence of a discrete, "completed" product makes the weblog as a form resistant to the commoditization either of itself, or of any one particular interpretation." (Himmer 2004) Or, in codework writer and artist Mez Breeze's words:

it seems evident that various web/net/code artists are more likely to be accepted into an academic reification circuit/traditional art market if they produce works that reflect a traditional craft-worker positioning. This "craft" orientation [producing skilled/practically inclined output, rather than placing adequate emphasis on the conceptual or ephemeral aspects of a networked, or code/software-based, medium] is embraced and replicated by artists who create finished, marketable, tangible objects; read: work that slots nicely into a capitalistic framework where products/objects are commodified and hence equated with substantiated worth. (Breeze 2003)
