the drawing. You are "drawing blind." Elements and development are added because what you are not allowed to look at this drawing. The exercise suggests a design.

In comparing figures 2.13 and 2.23 the difference in how space between interior and exterior spaces will be apparent. Because Zevi's sketch provides a readily noted and proportionate, in contrast to the drawing of a room, we are unconsciously a finished line and they clearly mapping and drawing space.

SUMMARY

Visual drawing is foundational. It is a record of the things that you see and think. It makes a visual connection between the artist and the world of whether that subject is from the real world or from the world of the imagination. It can take place in the initial stages of a drawing and can serve as a means of early thinking about and a reference of it in the process.

Edward makes themselves up to the nature of the drawing. It is a type that leads to that part of us that has immediate responses that we, compare and respond to a wide world.

The basic approach of getting information and organization for drawing takes the artist to work in an existing situation. They are people who are seeing objects and relations and having them in space. They have to figure the whole before going to the parts. These approaches focus a drawing for a more sustained drawing and provide a comprehensive view early in the drawing.

Continuous drawing on the other hand, offers a more to a line, more a sequence of the parts. It allows one seeing and thinking to be more detailed understanding of how the particular is to the whole.

These comprehensive beginning approaches involve steps of studying, then dimensional forms into a two-dimensional surface. Through these techniques we
