

Use of HepVO® for ventilation of branch pipes

Technical Note TN10318

Branch pipe ventilation

Where branch pipes are long or steep, negative pressures can develop in the system which can cause loss of seal in water seal traps by self siphonage. EN 12056-2, Table 6 and Approved Document H1, Diagram 3 give guidance on when provision of branch pipe ventilation is required. This is traditionally by provision of a water seal trap incorporating an AAV.

HepVO® used as air admittance valve for branch ventilation

Where HepVO® is used in place of a water seal trap there is no further need for a branch air admittance valve for venting protection at that appliance.

The HepVO® will only allow air to enter the systems and will prevent backflow of air from the stack.

When negative pressure occurs, the HepVO® valve partially opens and closes until sufficient air flow is drawn to maintain it open. Once equilibrium is reached, the valve closes. Positive pressure in the downstream system applies pressure to the valve keeping it closed.

Plumbing design

Subject to verification, HepVO® can be used as branch pipe air admittance valves for single or multiple dwellings.
