Marriage: Absurdity and Assertiveness

In the stiff Victorian era, marriage was the ultimate ticket to a happy future, and sometime parents would regard a good spouse with wealth and an excellent upbringing over the happiness of their children. Jane Austen expresses the silliness of the situation in Mr. Collins' proposal to Elizabeth in Pride and Prejudice through clever word choice, contrasting sentence length, and unusual punctuation to denote sarcasm; this in turn also allows Elizabeth to break free from social expectations by poking fun at the snobbery of the upper class.

Austen's word choice in the interaction between Mr. Collins and Elizabeth creates humorous melodrama, which emphasizes Mr. Collins' pompous nature and Elizabeth's exasperation at his garish proposal. After his flowery, drawn-out speech, Elizabeth finds it "absolutely necessary to interrupt him now" (92). The use of the adverb stresses her irritation at the proposal, showing her resilience against an otherwise prosperous marriage. She firmly believes against marriage without love. Austen then uses the word "cried" to voice her response to Collins—not once, but twice—when the typical "said" could easily be used in its place (93). The purpose of her word choice was to create mock drama, which accentuates the whimsical nature of the scene and adds to the ridiculousness of Collins' proposal. When Collins' speaks, his language also shows his general idiocy as a character. He insists that he will praise Elizabeth's "modesty, economy, and other amiable qualifications" the next time he meets Lady Catherine (93). The string of threes here, as well as his choice in traits, gives him a pompous tone characteristic of snobby upper class people. Austen purposefully uses this to poke fun at him and provide contrast with Elizabeth's clever way with her own words. This sets the two apart in their views about marriage—Collins follows society in the belief that marriage is almost a political affair to benefit two sides in social status and wealth, whereas Elizabeth sticks to her belief that marriage should be for love and happiness.

The differences between Elizabeth and Collins are highlighted as well through the length of their sentences. This is also another way Austen makes fun of the upper class. Collins' sentences are long and unnecessarily florid, as when he begins, "I am not now to learn..." (93). In contrast, Elizabeth's sentences are short and to the point, seen when she states, "I am perfectly serious in my refusal" (93). This satirical style of writing is symbolic of the stance
