ABSTRACT

To put it another way, pedal power is the conversion of human power into mechanical power by means of a pedal and gear system. A bicycle has been propelled by this technology for more than a century and is the most frequent mode of personal transportation. Pedal power is used less often to power agricultural and hand equipment, as well as to produce energy. Pedal-powered computers, grinders, and water wells are all examples of pedal-powered devices. A pedal-powered washing machine is the focus of this project. In this machine, the pedalling is turned into rotational motion using a compound gear system, which is the underlying principle. However, cloth cleaning has long been regarded a nuisance due to its time-consuming nature, which makes it a necessary component of our daily routines. Washing machines now come in a broad range of styles and sizes. As a general rule, electric-powered washing machines use detergents that create a pulsating flow around the garments they are washing. Some 70% of the population in our nation has a very low economic standing and cannot afford a washing machine owing to financial restraints or the lack of energy for whatever reason.

INTRODUCTION

Pedal power washing machines employ a foot pedal and gear mechanism to transmit energy from a human source. For more than a century, bicycles have relied on this technology to move them forward. Used bicycles are being turned into pedal power equipment in certain third country development initiatives.

Peddalling produces four times the power (1/4 HP) as hand-cranking does. Continuous pedalling can only be sustained for a maximum of 10 minutes at a pace of 14 HP [1-3]. Nearly 60 minutes of cycling at 1/8 HP (half the power) is double, but the amount of power that an individual can generate depends on their age. As a result of the brainstorming process, it became evident that the bicycle served as a particularly effective example of a pedal-powered product.

Using a pedal-powered washing machine would save time and energy for women as they clean their clothing [4]. The majority of women responded that they would use their leisure time to make crafts or food and sell it. Working alongside their moms at home might provide their daughters more time to focus on their education. If our washing machines are a success, we may even see an increase in small businesses. In many underdeveloped nations, women are forced to wash their own clothing by hand, despite they might be working in a more lucrative or gratifying field.

Several groups in Central America and Africa have already indicated an interest in pedal-powered technology. In comparison to devices powered by electricity or fossil fuels, it is a low-cost and environmentally-friendly alternative option. The devices may be produced locally, and repair parts are inexpensive and easily accessible since they are based on bicycle components. A bicycle designed to be manufactured and maintained in any culture that uses bicycle technology will hopefully help women in developing countries around the world gain access to appropriate technology and opportunities and open up new avenues for pedal-powered or appropriate technologies to help women.
