Kamath,I. K. Fodor,2003 Detecting and tracking objects in spatio temporal datasets is an active research area with applications in many domains A common approach is to segment the 2D frames in order to separate the objects of interest from the background then estimate the motion of the objects and track them over time Most existing algorithms assume that the objects to be tracked are rigid In many scientific simulations however the objects of interest evolve over time and thus pose additional challenges for the segmentation and tracking tasks We investigate efficient segmentation methods in the context of scientific simulation data Instead of segmenting each frame separately we propose an incremental approach which incorporates the segmentation result from the previous time frame when segmenting the data at the current time frame We start with the simple K means method then we study more complicated segmentation techniques based on Markov random fields We compare the incremental methods to the corresponding sequential ones both in terms of the quality of the results as well as computational complexity
