negotiators can learn to better integrate emotional skills into negotiation among the most emotionally charged of professional spheres While the three books share the central premise that emotionality plays a critical role in the unfolding dynamics of all negotiations each offers its own primary lesson Lacey Smith's business oriented Get It examines how the emotions of hope and fear can be both tools and obstacles to the interest based bargaining method we first learned in Roger Fisher's classic Getting to Yes Fisher and Shapiro's Beyond Reason takes the Getting to Yes method to the next level of sophistication providing a taxonomy of core emotional concerns that underlie individual negotiators behavior and with it a Seven Elements like structure from which to prepare advance and overcome emotional obstacles in each negotiating context Peter Ladd's Mediation Conciliation and Emotions expands the analysis of emotional content in a negotiation from the individual to the shared experience exploring the establishment of emotional climates that arise between individuals and offering empirically based counsel for mediators and conciliators about how to help remedy undesirable emotional climates and create emotional climates more conducive to problem solving No book has all the answers we need but each makes a valuable contribution to the field
