From climate change to the contemporary food price crisis, vulnerable populations and especially rural people are facing increasingly difficult odds of flourishing. Such challenges are even more pronounced where there is conflict, whose multidimensional nature demands to direct more attention to its drivers.

and impacts Over the past decades social protection has contributed to development outcomes such as those related to poverty reduction food and nutrition security and gender equality Besides social protection systems have proven to be effective also in addressing covariate shocks as exemplified by the responses to the COVID 19 pandemic There has instead been limited operational research regarding social protection s contributions to peace In order to start addressing this gap this paper discusses how social protection can sustain peace efforts by understanding peace not as an outcome but rather as an ongoing process The paper argues that the contributions that social protection can make to peace can be divided between two overlapping scenarios working in conflict and working on conflict While the former refers to efforts aimed at offsetting the impacts of conflict the latter relates to interventions that intend to deliberately address its underlying drivers The working paper also recognizes that social protection interventions in a conflict affected context can potentially be harmful and fuel social tensions in the absence of adequate consideration of local power dynamics It therefore calls for social protection strategies and programmes to be conflict sensitive beyond the do no harm to make explicit contributions to peace
