Integrative Negotiation

A Strategy for Creating Value

Imagine that two sisters are vying for the last orange in their refrigerator. How should they decide who gets it? Most people would cut it in half because neither one could convince the other to give up the whole thing. But what if each sister approached the situation by asking the other why she wanted it? This scenario illustrates the classic distinction between distributive and integrative negotiation, the two dominant negotiation strategies. In contrast with distributive negotiation's competitive approach, integrative negotiation is collaborative. "Expanding the pie" allows both parties to create value and satisfy their needs. The following pages discuss the essence of integrative negotiation, when it is appropriate to negotiate this way, and the tactics that are used to implement it.
