Accounting for Receivables

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

1. For a service company, a receivable is recorded when service is provided on account and the revenue is recognized. For a merchandising company, a receivable is recorded at the point of sale of merchandise on account.
2. Accounts and notes receivable are sometimes called trade receivables because they result from sales transactions and occur in the normal course of business operations.
3. (a) In order to manage its accounts receivable, a company must be able to account for customer transactions on a customer by customer basis. The use of detailed customer accounts ensures that customers payments on account are properly recorded and outstanding balances are promptly and appropriately updated. Up to date accounts provide management with a tool to follow up with collection efforts. Detailed records also allow management to properly assess the credit status of any individual customer when deciding on credit terms and determining if allowing additional sales creates additional credit risks.

(b) In order to keep track of individual customer accounts, companies use a subsidiary ledger that shows all of the sales and collection activity on a customer by customer basis. The accounts receivable account in the general ledger is a control account that tracks all transactions affecting accounts receivable in total for all customer accounts. That total is in turn used when preparing the balance sheet. Each transaction that affects accounts receivable is posted twice: once to the subsidiary ledger and once in total to the general ledger. Normally, in a manual system, entries to the subsidiary ledger are posted daily, while entries to the general ledger are summarized and posted monthly.
4. Interest is recorded on an account receivable balance once the customer has failed to pay the account by the due date given in the negotiated terms documented on the invoice. Sometimes a grace period, of three days, for example, is given for payments received beyond the due dates, before interest is applied to the account. The rate of interest calculated must correspond to the terms given in the invoice.
5. Ernie's argument is flawed because only bank credit card sales are cash
