Incremental Analysis and Decision-making Costs

Nature of Incremental Analysis

Decision-making is essentially a process of selecting the best alternative given the available information for comparison of strengths and weaknesses of each alternative. If there exists no alternative to the current course of action, then there is no decision to be made. However, it is rare regarding any course of action for there not be alternatives. In personal decision-making, factors other than income and expenses such as qualitative factors may be more important than cost in deciding. However, in business decisions are generally made by identifying the alternative with the most revenue or the least cost.

Incremental analysis is a decision-making tool in which the relevant costs and revenues of one alternative are compared to the relevant costs and revenues of another alternative. Relevant costs may be defined as those future costs that are different between alternatives. Costs that are the same are considered irrelevant. Incremental analysis is sometimes called differential costing, marginal costing, or relevant costing.

Incremental analysis is basically a worksheet technique in which the relevant costs of one alternative are listed in one column and the relevant costs of another alternative are listed in an adjacent column. Frequently, an optional third column is used to show the difference in the costs. The differences in relevant costs are called incremental costs. Technically, incremental cost may be defined as the difference between the sum of the relevant costs of two alternatives. In short, it is a tool for choosing between two alternatives. The best decision is the one with the least amount of relevant costs or the greatest relevant revenue.

Incremental analysis is not an optimization technique. Rather it is a tool for using appropriate cost concepts to measure and evaluate the relevant cost inputs. It is basic tool for measuring the difference in revenues or costs between two alternatives. Incremental analysis is a tool which first requires that the appropriate costs be identified and then measured.
