China-Africa Relations in the 21st Century Jennifer L. Parenti, Air University (U.S.).

Air Command and Staff College, 2008 The intent of this research is to determine if the People's Republic of China (PRC) has the potential to affect the mission of USAFRICOM and if so how USAFRICOM should respond To conduct this research I conducted a thorough review of existing literature including documents published by the US and PRC governments journals and newspaper articles to create a record of China's activities in Africa since 1996 From these documents I extrapolated China's grand strategy toward Africa and its potential impact on USAFRICOM operations This information combined with US national objectives provided the basis for recommendations on how USAFRICOM should respond to the PRC's activities The research found that over the past decade China developed a unified strategy in Africa designed to secure vital natural resources promote Chinese businesses and services abroad and create a foundation of political and military alliances upon which China can take a lead in world affairs While espousing the values of state sovereignty and non interference China also engaged directly in African internal politics and business activities and not always with positive results Nonetheless US and PRC interests in Africa are converging and China's actions often directly support US objectives Given Chinese influence and Africa's growing strategic importance the time has come to pursue a cooperative African agenda with the PRC to ensure Chinese activities do not run counter to US policy and to protect the interests of Africa Based on China's recent experiences in Africa the US should promote a cooperative approach through an existing institution like the African Union and focus on areas of common interest including peacekeeping and peacekeeper training maritime security and military infrastructure development
