Le Heron, Eric Pawson, 1996 In the nineties New Zealand entered a period of rapid and comprehensive change which has become widely known outside the country as the New Zealand experiment Changing places New Zealand in the nineties captures the dramatic changes over the last decade and provides a map to help interpret the complexity How are we connected to other places In what ways are we re discovering our own places How and through whose agency is change being regulated particularly in view of the common understanding that deregulation is the order of the day To what extent is change in localities a result of global influences

Changing places New Zealand in the nineties is the successor to Changing places in New Zealand a geography of restructuring In this new book the authors have concentrated on issues of the mid 1990s globalisation corporate strategies labour flexibility social policy sustainability urban and regional futures patterns of consumption and how all these are affecting people s senses of place Using the Geographic Restructuring model which was developed in the first book the authors simultaneously give an outside and an inside view of the past ten years of change allowing the restructuring of the 1980s and 1990s to be seen as a fusion of both th country s participation in global restructuring and particular interactions arising from local and national initiatives The model raises fundamental changes in New Zealand society and how agents in different social spheres are behaving in the new economic and institutional milieu We come closer to establishing why and by what means particular interests have been able to influence directions of change Back cover Civil engineering ,2006
