Modern composite bridges in Germany

Introduction

Steel bridges in Germany have traditionally been equipped with orthotropic decks. However, their number has strongly decreased against composite bridges with concrete decks. This means that the increase in concrete decks is only 4m<sup>2</sup> of new bridge deck about 1990 for an orthotropic deck that only about 15000 for a concrete deck. In addition, an orthotropic deck is more sensitive to flexing which means its roadway considerably faster slippery due to icing. A concrete deck is more robust and shows less sensitive to fatigue damage and is also stiffer than an orthotropic deck and therefore superior in meeting surface requirements for use.

German codes were changed in the 1990s, meeting today those of some previous concrete roadway bridge under service conditions. Indeed, code control has to be supplied by a sufficient amount of flexural distributed reinforcement so that the cracks width is limited to 0.3mm. In this way the traditional longitudinal joint reinforcement is no longer necessary – sufficient because much of the compression force goes from the concrete deck into the steel through the so stirrings and tying. Today, only lower steel reinforcement is used, the maximum for this rule is the latest development the bridge became with corrugated webs.

The use of simply stiffened web steel plates has prevailed in Germany during the last 20 years from about 120000 to about 120000 tonnes including sections and numerous girders. Composite steel bridges are competitive the bridges with spans above about 80m because of lower costs and shorter construction periods. Corrugated webs can be less expensive than those with welded stiffeners if their production is automated.

Even if a composite bridge itself is more costly than an all-steel one, the complete project may be more economic with a composite superstructure due to additional savings in shorter approach spans due to reduced horizontal, pier and foundation costs, shorter construction period and traffic interruptions.

Today's new concrete bridges under the modernisation requirements of steel bridges in Germany are similar to those of concrete bridges with about 10% of construction costs per year and smaller demolition costs for steel bridges than for concrete bridges.

In Germany, the total length of all existing finished bridge today comes to about 1400km, nearly 50% of which are all steel or composite bridges. These allow for built higher harmonic large bridges, e.g. for the new motorways in mountainous regions in East Germany.

While in 1970 only 24% of all steel bridges were composite, this share has recently increased to 60% due to the above mentioned reasons.

The German Public Roads Administration currently publishes the following criteria for steel bridges:

- for spans up to about 50m are increasingly supported concrete bridges, the longer spans are composite bridges,
- for spanning the concrete roadway deck are reinforcement which are supported from underneath in order to avoid the vertical joints around the smaller supports for the roadway deck and to permit continuous loading of the roadway surface,
- for reducing the cost of extensive protection of the steel from rust to facilitate their handling and construction with precast steel beam-arched bridge instead of a single box with beam and deck connection protection.

Open sections should permit to maintain all parts involved in the bridge and construction of all bridge parts, especially, deck and bottom plates an important part is made of them.

Golden Bridges

Platzmarkt development

One of the earliest examples for light-weight steel bridges was built by Fritz Lenzbach with his Helligersauer Bruggen in Germany built in 1845, Fig. 1.

As so-called 'steel web deck' had the second characteristic of 1.40 although the steel quality and the welding technology were not that good still in their infancy. The bridge showed no deterioration after more than 16 years before it had to be demolished due to road realignment.

Longspan bridges in Germany have traditionally been
