

The String Quartets of Bartók are probably his most representative works. They form the backbone of his whole output; they show in a clear line the growth and development of the composer. In this respect Bartók reminds us of Beethoven, whose quartet writing also occupied such a central position among his works. But in more than one respect are we reminded of Beethoven: Bartók, too, seems to express his most essential thoughts through the medium of the string quartet. Bartók's style in his quartets, just like Beethoven's, is particularly concentrated and intense; his ideas are most convincing and expressed with the utmost clarity and economy. I believe that for generations to come the string quartets of Bartók will be looked upon as the most outstanding and significant works of our time.

First String Quartet

The FIRST STRING QUARTET immediately shows us the forceful personality of the young composer. We ought to realise when we listen to the work to-day that it was written nearly forty years ago, in 1908, when the composer was 27. It still retains to-day that boldness and freshness which must have been quite astonishing 40 years ago and which makes it a most stimulating and alive composition even to-day, whilst thousands of other pieces written at the same time crumbled to dust.

The work opens with a slow Fugue of a truly Beethovenian spirit and dignity. It is the spirit of the opening of the great C sharp minor quartet.

At the end of the theme the syncopated rhythm
