Decision Analysis: An Overview

RALPH L. KEENEY

Woodward-Clyde Consultants, San Francisco, California

(Received February 1981; accepted June 1982)

This article, written for the nondecision analyst, describes what decision analysis is, what it can and cannot do, why one should care to do this, and how one does it. To accomplish these purposes, it is necessary first to describe the decision environment. The article also presents an overview of decision analysis and provides additional sources for its foundations, procedures, history, and applications.

1. THE DECISION ENVIRONMENT

THE ENVIRONMENT in which decisions must be made is more complex than ever before. Governmental regulations, such as the National Environmental Policy Act and the Occupational Safety and Health Act, require corporations and governmental agencies to consider and justify the impact of their actions. Informed consumers, employees, and shareholders demand greater public consciousness, responsibility, and accountability from corporate and governmental decision makers. For example, executives evaluating potential mergers or acquisitions must consider antitrust suits and other legal matters, social impact, and political issues in addition to financial aspects. In appraising potential public programs or the elimination of existing programs, a governmental agency should consider not only the multifaceted costs and benefits of its options but also the diversity of the population and its sometimes conflicting viewpoints and political concerns.

Such examples suggest several factors contributing to the complexity of decision problems. Because the purpose of analysis is to illuminate complexity and provide insight, it is worthwhile to summarize these intertwined features.

1. Multiple objectives. It is desirable to achieve several objectives at once. In evaluating routes for proposed pipelines, one wishes simultaneously to minimize environmental impact, minimize health and safety hazards, maximize economic benefits, maximize positive social impact, and please all groups of interested citizens.
