Treatment of Pituitary Dwarfism with Human Growth Hormone

Kathy was a typical child in most respects—happy, playful, a bit mischievous, and intelligent. Indeed, the only thing unusual about Kathy was her small stature. She was born with pituitary dwarfism, which results from a deficiency of human growth hormone (hGH). Kathy seemed destined to remain abnormally small throughout her life. Then, at age 10, Kathy began receiving treatments of hGH synthesized in bacteria. She grew five inches during her first year of treatments. By continuing to receive hGH during maturation, Kathy reached the short end of the normal height distribution for adults. Without these treatments, she would have remained abnormally small in stature.

The hGH that allowed Kathy to grow to near-normal size was one of the first products of genetic engineering, the use of designed or modified genes to synthesize desired products. hGH was initially produced in E. coli cells harboring a modified gene composed of the coding sequence for hGH fused to synthetic bacterial regulatory elements. This chimeric gene was constructed in vitro and introduced into E. coli by transformation. In 1985, hGH produced in E. coli became the second pharmaceutical product of genetic engineering to be approved for use in humans by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration. Human insulin, which was the first such product, was approved in 1982.
