3.1 THE RISE OF REVERSE OSMOSIS

Water scarcity is being recognized as one of the main threats that mankind is facing globally (Fritzmänn, et al., 2007). Reverse Osmosis (RO) membrane technology has developed as a promising technology to address this problem, holding roughly 44% market share and growing among all the desalinating technologies (Valavala, et al., 2011). This increased market adoption has been driven as materials have been improved and costs have dropped (Greenlee, et al., 2009). This is especially relevant in arid regions such in the Middle East countries (ME), where population is located in arid and semi-arid regions, with a very limited rainfall, and where due to high ambient temperatures, evaporation contributes to a higher stress degree to the naturally available water sources. Moreover, water scarcity is aggravated by the population increase this region is exposed, as well as the economic development (Guo, et al., 2000). All these factors, together with the favorable energy to product quality ratio that seawater reverse osmosis (SWRO) offers, has situated this technology as one key driver to sustain population living standards in ME countries (Carroll, et al., 2000).
