Chapter 2 Exercise Solutions

- 2.1 Describe and illustrate the client-server architecture of one or more major Internet applications (for example the Web, email or netnews).

2.1 Ans.

Web:

Browsers are clients of Domain Name Servers (DNS) and web servers (HTTP). Some intranets are configured to interpose a Proxy server. Proxy servers fulfil several purposes – when they are located at the same site as the client, they reduce network delays and network traffic. When they are at the same site as the server, they form a security checkpoint (see pp. 107 and 271) and they can reduce load on the server.

N.B. DNS servers are also involved in all of the application architectures described below, but they are omitted from the discussion for clarity.

Email:

Sending messages: User Agent (the user's mail composing program) is a client of a local SMTP server and passes each outgoing message to the SMTP server for delivery. The local SMTP server uses mail routing tables to determine a route for each message and then forwards the message to the next SMTP server on the chosen route. Each SMTP server similarly processes and forwards each incoming message unless the domain name in the message address matches the local domain. In the latter case, it attempts to deliver the message to local recipient by storing it in a mailbox file on a local disk or file server.

Reading messages: User Agent (the user's mail reading program) is either a client of the local file server or a client of a mail delivery server such as a POP or IMAP server. In the former case, the User Agent reads messages directly from the mailbox file in which they were placed during the message delivery. (Examples of such user agents are the UNIX mail and pine commands.) In the latter case, the User Agent requests information about the contents of the user's mailbox file from a POP or IMAP server and receives messages from those servers for presentation to the user. POP and IMAP are protocols specifically designed to support mail access over wide areas and slow network connections, so a user can continue to access her home mailbox while travelling.
