Preliminary Validation of a Group Therapy for Individuals with Psychosis and Childhood Trauma Histories Using Acceptance and Commitment Therapy Alicia Spidel, 2018 Acceptance and Commitment Therapy ACT has shown effectiveness for individuals with psychosis and individuals with a history of childhood trauma but has not been investigated with people with psychosis who also have a history of childhood trauma The larger study was broken into two articles The first article looks at the potential effectiveness of ACT for those who had a history of trauma and psychosis The second article sought to increase our understanding of the impact of trauma on ACT treatment Specifically we wanted to determine if there are specific profiles of individuals who responded differently to the treatment based on several variables severity of trauma mindfulness attachment and number of sessions attended Fifty participants meeting our inclusion criteria were recruited and randomized to take part in either 8 sessions of ACT group or to be on a waiting list for the ACT group i e treatment as usual group Results Using RCA random coefficient analyses it was found that symptom severity for both overall symptoms and anxiety decreased over the course of the treatment and participants ability to regulate their emotional reactions i e accept them increased The study also found that treatment compliance increased with regards to help seeking for those in the ACT group compared with the wait list controls The second study found that trauma severity did not moderate the effectiveness of ACT on symptom severity participants ability to regulate their emotional reactions or treatment compliance with regards to help seeking In addition clusters analyses revealed that there were three different profiles when looking at how much clients benefitted from ACT treatment groups between pre and post treatment The differences between clusters were all clinically relevant Avoidant attachment style and number of sessions predicted belonging to the different clusters or profiles For instance those in Profile 1 and 3 attended an average of 2 sessions more than Profile 2 which may explain why participants included in Profile 2 were found to change the least in terms of the four outcomes ACT offered in a group appears a promising treatment for those with psychosis and history of trauma regardless of symptom severity
