Fire Safety Engineering Guidelines Australian Building Codes Board, 2001 These Guidelines have been developed for use in the fire safety design and assessment of buildings They are intended to provide guidance for fire safety engineers as they work to develop and access strategies that provide acceptable levels of safety In particular the Guidelines provide guidance for the design and assessment of alternative fire solutions against the requirements of performance based building codes They will also be of use to other people such as authorities having jurisdiction carrying out their role of approving building designs

Fire Safety Engineering Carlos Quaglia, S. J. Grubits, Commonwealth Scientific and Industrial Research Organization (Australia). Division of Building, Construction and Engineering, 1995 Fire safety engineering is currently used in Australia to provide solutions to fire safety problems in buildings as an alternative to strict compliance with the prescriptive requirements of the Building Code of Australia 1 The methodology finds application on novel buildings such as shopping malls airport terminals sporting complexes and buildings with atria where the prescriptive requirements of the building regulations are often not appropriate The other principal area of application is in the refurbishment of existing buildings where compliance with one particular acceptable solution is often not possible Application of the method is designed to provide a level of fire safety equivalent to that prescribed in the regulations Demonstrating equivalence to the regulatory requirements is paramount to the acceptance of the method The method however is not limited to assessment of regulatory compliance compliance with owner or occupier objectives can also be accommodated Buildings having large enclosed spaces such as atria malls airport terminals exhibition centres are intended to house hundreds sometimes thousands of people that need to be evacuated before smoke propagation becomes a threat In addition to security to the public issues such as protection of the contents e g exhibits in the case of an exhibition centre need to be considered
