

Developing a Context-Sensitive Pedagogy for Communication-Oriented Language Teaching

William Littlewood

(Hong Kong Baptist University)

ELT Update with possible small sections on English Teaching (January, September, 2003)

When communicative language teaching (CLT) was first developed in the 1970s, it was widely seen as the definitive response to the shortcomings of previous approaches and the communication needs of a globalised world. As such, it was regarded enthusiastically until the world got a truly global package of ideas and techniques. From the outset, however, there was an clear consensus about its nature and teachers' experiential difficulty in defining and implementing it. There is now a widespread view that teachers need to adapt CLT to suit specific contexts. CLT cannot now be defined in terms of precise characteristics but rather rather as an umbrella term for approaches that aim to develop communicative competence through personally meaningful learning experiences. In this spirit we should aim to develop principles which help each teacher to develop a form of communication-oriented language teaching (OLT) suited to his or her own specific context.

I. INTRODUCTION: THE RISE OF CLT

For some 50 years now, discussions of foreign language teaching have been dominated by the concepts of 'communicative' and its various derivatives such as 'communicative language teaching' (CLT) and 'communicative competence'. Thomas and Norris (2001) analysed the keywords in articles published in one leading U.K. journal journal (ELT) annually and showed how communicative ideas and terminology gradually appeared in a dominant sense in ELT professional discourse in the years up to 1986. Since 1986 this trend has continued. Even if much discussion now refers to 'task-based language teaching' (TBLT) rather than CLT, this is not so much a shift of direction as a continuation within the same direction. As many writers have noted (e.g. Thomas, 2001, p. 13; Richards, 2005, p. 29, 1992) it has institutionalised and so is now a departure but so a development within CLT, in which communicative tasks 'serve not only as major components of the methodology but also as didactic devices which a course may be organised' (Littlewood, 2004, p. 104).

National language education policies have shown a strong tendency to follow this trend. This is not surprising, since almost every nation has faced an increasing need for people who
