

Consumer Behaviour Exam

5. Personality and lifestyle are believed to play a defining role in consumer behaviour. Using relevant academic theory and professional examples, answer the following:

a) Aaker's (1997) Brand Personality Scale (BPS) model argues that brand personality plays an important role in achieving brand resonance. Explain why brand personality is becoming increasingly important and what benefits Aaker's model offers to brands. (25 marks)

There is a multifaceted nature to consumer behaviour, involving multiple disciplines. "It is the process of acquiring, purchasing, using, and disposing of products, services, ideas, or experiences to satisfy needs or desires." Solomon (2020, p.22). Also, 90% of the UK companies are service led stated in the 2019 statistics.

Brand resonance is how well a company relates to the customers and vice versa.

(Keller, 2003) Brand personality is the human characteristics associated with a firm and its products are referred to as brand personality. It's stronger if these parts are purposefully coordinated and the personality is maintained over time. Companies create brand personalities that reflect the essential characteristics of their prestige target audience.

According to Aaker's Personality scale, there are 5 factors to show the personality dimensions.

1. Sincerity - Agreeableness (Genuine, Kind, Thoughtful). Safety companies might use this trait

The sincerity dimension means how brands are seen to be trustworthy, and kind. This means the brand is following the ethical practices and is socially responsible. Companies have to maintain good relationships with their customers to enhance their relationship quality.

For example, a company Patagonia is not just a company with high customer values but also acting as an environmental activist helped them to gain customer retention and good reviews for the brand. They believed in Recycling and reselling which is basically
