Abstract

[illegible]

Competition has numerous effects on the community. It reduces the number of individuals of a species that can survive. It also affects the growth and reproduction of the individuals. It can also affect the behavior of the individuals. For example, a species may become more aggressive when it is competing for resources. It may also become more social, forming groups to defend resources. Competition can also affect the distribution of a species. It may cause a species to move to a new area where there is less competition. It may also cause a species to become more specialized, focusing on a specific resource. Competition is a key factor in the evolution of a species. It can lead to the development of new traits that help a species survive in a competitive environment. It can also lead to the extinction of a species that is unable to compete. Competition is a complex and dynamic process that shapes the community in many ways.
