Activate Prior Knowledge Have students think of a sports team playing a big game. If the team wants to win, they have to run plays that will put them in the best scoring position. Ask, How are all the players going to know what play to run? The coach or player communicates the play to other team members. Tell students that the body has two major modes of internal communications, through the nervous and endocrine systems. The types of signals they send are very different.

TEACH FROM VISUALS

FIGURE 29.1 Point out that the organs of the endocrine system are not physically connected. They communicate with the body by way of the chemical signals they produce that travel through the bloodstream.

Answers

▶ Analyze Elevated body temperature causes the body to sweat. Bright light causes the pupils to shrink.

How Organ Systems Communicate

KEY CONCEPT The nervous system and the endocrine system provide the means by which organs communicate.

MAIN IDEAS

- The body's communication systems help maintain homeostasis.
- The nervous and endocrine systems have different methods and rates of communication.

VOGABULARY

peripheral nervous system (PNS), p. 875

FIGURE 29.1 The nervous system (yellow) is a physically connected network, while the endocrine system (red) is made up of physically separated organs.

Connect Scientists try to find new ways, such as MRI scans, to study the brain because the brain is so important. Your brain lets you think and move. It controls digestion, heart rate, and body temperature. Your brain does these things with help from the endocrine system and the rest of the nervous system.

MAIN IDEA

The body's communication systems help maintain homeostasis.

Homeostasis depends on the ability of different systems in your body to communicate with one another. To maintain homeostasis, messages must be generated, delivered, interpreted, and acted upon by your body. The nervous system and the endocrine system are the communication networks that allow you to respond to changes in your environment countless times each day.

- The nervous system is a physically connected network of cells, tissues, and organs that controls thoughts, movements, and simpler life processes such as swallowing. For example, when you walk outside without sunglasses on a sunny day, your nervous system senses the bright light coming into your eyes. It sends a message that tells your pupils to shrink and let in less light.
- The endocrine system (ENDO-duh-kree-n) is a collection of physically disconnected organs that helps to control growth, development, and responses to your environment, such as body temperature. For example, when you are outside on a hot day or you exercise, your body starts to feel warm. Your endocrine system responds by producing messages that tell your body to sweat more so that you can cool down.

Both of these systems, which are shown in FIGURE 29.1, let you respond to a stimulus in your environment and maintain homeostasis. A stimulus (STIH-muh-yuh-lah) is defined most broadly as something that causes a response. In living systems, a stimulus is anything that triggers a change in an organism. Changes can be chemical, cellular, or behavioral.

▶ Analyze What stimuli cause you to sweat and cause your pupils to shrink?

Differentiated Instruction

BELOW LEVEL

Encourage students to write one or two potential test questions for each of the paragraphs that they read in this section. Tell them to write the answer to each question immediately. Explain that this is a method of reinforcing learning by building memory pathways by two different routes—reading and writing.

ENGLISH LEARNERS

Some students may not understand the analogy on page 875 comparing the endocrine system to satellite television and the nervous system to cable television. You may need to explain the differences between standard, satellite, and cable television for students to grasp this concept.
