

Answers to Chapter 7 End-of-Chapter Questions

1. What are the effects on metamorphic minerals and textures of temperature, confining pressure, and differential stress?

Temperature increases rates of chemical reactions, therefore increasing the temperature on a rock may result in the formation of a metamorphic rock. Commonly, minerals formed at high metamorphic temperatures are coarser grained than minerals formed at lower metamorphic temperatures. In addition, higher temperatures lead to "dry" rocks and, therefore, metamorphic minerals formed at high temperatures generally are anhydrous (do not contain water or OH) in their chemical formulas. These dry (very hydrous) rocks change to more hydrated hydrous, more change to amphiboles (are hydrous than muscov), and amphiboles change to pyroxenes (completely anhydrous).

Pressure (confining pressure) increases as rocks are buried deeper within the earth. As a result, metamorphic minerals formed at high pressures typically take up less volume than metamorphic minerals formed at lower pressures.

Differential stresses occur when rocks are placed under forces that are not equal in all directions. This leads to deformation (changing of the shape of the rocks). Differential stresses generally result in the formation of foliation (partial alignment of mineral grains in the metamorphic rock).

More details can be found on pages 175-177 in your textbook.

2. What are the various sources of heat for metamorphism?

Most metamorphic heat is derived from the surface heat of geothermal energy from the earth's interior (which largely results from radioactive decay of elements within the earth). A second source of heat for metamorphism comes from the friction of plates against each other.
